Certificate in Counselling Skills

Aidan Abernethy and Josephine Russell

This course is designed to develop counselling skills to both help in the workplace and to prepare participants for further person-centred counselling training. It is particularly suitable for those whose work demands relating with others, such as in the caring professions, teaching, human resources, as well as being suitable preparatory work for professional post-graduate counselling training such as the Norwich Centre Post-Graduate Diploma in Counselling.

Moreover, this course invites you to develop your ability to listen to self and explore your sense of spirituality. Through offering Rogers' core conditions, the facilitators will endeavour to create an environment where you will feel sufficiently confident to engage in self-exploration and risk sharing with others. It is this increased self-knowledge that can increase the potential for discovering more genuine/authentic ways of relating. You will take responsibility for your own development, whilst respecting the individual processes of other group members.

The course will focus on three main areas:

- unstructured large group work
- exploration of theory
- listening/counselling skills practice

Alongside the experiential learning, you will be asked to undertake one formative and three assessed assignments to reflect your understanding of counselling skills, the person-centred approach and your self-awareness. You will be aided in this by referring to your reflective journal that you will need to maintain throughout the duration of the course. Time spent on reflecting and reading outside of the course will enable you to benefit more fully from the experience.

Please note that one weekend and two full Saturdays of group work are built into the timetable. These form an integral part of the course and it is important that you are able to commit to these from the outset.

The Aims of the Certificate in Counselling Skills:

- To provide training that enables students to develop the skills of the person-centred approach as developed by the late Carl Rogers and his associates.
- To provide knowledge, skills and understanding relating to the contribution of research to the profession.
- To encourage the view that doing research is integral to good practice.

- One unique aim of the Certificate course is to engage in exploration of the implications of person-centred theory and practice for spiritual understanding and development.
- The person-centred focus of the course is reflected not only in the content of the course but also in the model of assessment. At the end of the course each individual engages in a peer and self-assessment process which is monitored by course staff and an external examiner.

Facilitators: Aidan Abernethy and Josephine Russell

Aidan and Josephine have both worked as counsellors for a number of years and are delighted to have the opportunity to offer this person-centred training course at the Norwich Centre. Both are experienced trainers and supervisors who have delivered training in counselling in various contexts including the education and commercial sectors. They are committed to working as closely as possible to the core principles of the person-centred approach, focusing on the quality of authentic presence and relationship. Aidan is especially interested in the potential for counselling and self-development to become vibrant and creative encounters with both oneself and others. Josephine's interest lies in the application of the person-centred approach beyond the counselling room.

We are delighted that Professor Brian Thorne will visit and contribute to the course.

Award: The Certificate in Counselling Skills is designed as a university level course equivalent to 60 credits at NQF Level 6, and successful participants will be awarded the Norwich Centre Certificate in Counselling Skills.
